Two young workers, Kenji and Teresa, talk at their workplace.

Kenji: How did your weekend go? Were you able (32) or did you just stay home and relax?

Teresa: I was feeling (33), but I hung out with friends in the neighborhood and we put together a barbeque in a nearby park on Sunday.

Kenji: Sounds like fun. I envy you. I ended up coming into the office to (34) my work. My section is planning a training session for new employees next month. It's a three-day event and involves almost all of the top managers of our firm. Just reserving rooms and making the time schedule is a major job.

Teresa: How many employees are going (35) in the event?

Kenji: It involves 70 new people and 25 managers. The managers are busy people, so it's tough finding time slots when they can make presentations (36) their sections do.

Teresa: When I first came here to work there was a similar event. I took notes and (37) all of the names and faces of the top people. At the end of the event, I was exhausted and could hardly remember anything. But I did get an overview of the company and did remember a few of the people.

Kenji: I'm hoping that the way we set things up will make it easier for both sides to remember each other, but it's (38).
